The Approach to Answering HR Questions

1. Understand the Question's Purpose:

HR wants to assess skills like adaptability, cultural fit, problem-solving, or emotional intelligence.

Always think about why they're asking the question.

2. Use the STAR Method (Situation, Task, Action, Result):

Frame your response with a concise story that highlights relevant skills.

3. Tailor Responses to the Role:

Show how your experience or personality aligns with the company's requirements.

4. Be Honest and Reflective:

Don't exaggerate or provide generic answers.
Reflect on your experiences and be authentic.

Example 1: "Tell me about yourself."

- HR's Intent:

To gauge your confidence, communication skills, and alignment with the role. They want to see how well you summarize your professional journey and relate it to the position.

- Incorrect Approach:

"I'm a hard worker, quick learner, and really passionate about whatever I do." (Generic and doesn't add value.)

- Correct Approach:

Focus on relevance and progression.

"I have a background in digital marketing, with 3 years of experience in SEO and content strategy. In my previous role, I helped increase organic traffic by 40% within 6 months. I'm excited about this role because it aligns with my expertise and my goal to deepen my skills in performance marketing."

- Psychology Behind It:

(Unrealistic and doesn't provide insights into your abilities.)

- Correct Approach:

"In my last role, we faced an unexpected delay from a vendor that jeopardized a key deadline. I took the initiative to communicate with the client, managed their expectations, and negotiated with the vendor to expedite shipping. Top 7 Scenarios Where Candidates Believe They Are Behaving Normally, But It Comes Across as Unprofessional

Many candidates unknowingly behave in ways that are considered unprofessional in interviews. Below are the top 7 scenarios where candidates believe they are acting normally but are actually displaying unprofessional behavior. These behaviors may leave a negative impression on interviewers and reduce their chances of success.

1. Casual or Slang-filled Language (25% Impact)

Scenario: A candidate uses informal language, slang, or casual phrasing in an interview, thinking they are being friendly or relatable.

Example: “Yeah, that’s totally cool. I can do that, no problem.”

Why It’s Unprofessional: While casual language might be common in social settings, it doesn’t translate well to formal or professional interviews. Using slang may make the candidate sound immature or unprepared.

Professional Alternative: “I am confident in my ability to handle that, and I look forward to contributing in that area.”

2. Overly Casual Attire (20% Impact)

Scenario: The candidate wears casual clothes such as jeans, a t-shirt, or sneakers, believing it’s acceptable in a professional setting, especially for startup or creative roles.

Example: Showing up in a graphic tee and jeans for a corporate job interview.

Why It’s Unprofessional: Dressing too casually in an interview can signal a lack of seriousness, respect for the process, or unpreparedness.

Professional Alternative: A well-fitted suit or business casual attire such as a button-up shirt, slacks, and polished shoes.

3. Interrupting or Talking Over the Interviewer (15% Impact)

Scenario: The candidate interrupts the interviewer while they are speaking, assuming it shows enthusiasm or eagerness.

Example: “Oh, I know exactly what you mean. I did something similar in my last role...”

Why It’s Unprofessional: Interrupting or talking over the interviewer can come across as disrespectful, disorganized, or overly self-assured. It’s important to let the interviewer finish before responding.

Professional Alternative: Wait for the interviewer to finish speaking, then respond thoughtfully, “I agree with your point, and in my experience...”

4. Over-sharing Personal Information (15% Impact)

Scenario: A candidate discusses personal matters or complaints in the interview, thinking it helps build rapport or show their human side.

Example: “I’m sorry I’m late, my family was going through a lot this week, and I didn’t have time to prepare.”

Why It’s Unprofessional: Oversharing personal issues makes the candidate appear unprepared, unprofessional, or emotionally unstable. The interview should focus on qualifications and experience.

Professional Alternative: If necessary, keep personal details brief. “I apologize for the delay; I had some unforeseen personal matters, but I’m excited to discuss the role today.”

5. Negative Comments About Previous Employers (10% Impact)

Scenario: The candidate openly criticizes or complains about their previous employer, thinking it will explain their departure or show how they were wronged.

Example: “I couldn’t work with my last manager, she was completely disorganized.”

Why It’s Unprofessional: Speaking negatively about past employers or colleagues reflects poorly on the candidate's character and professionalism. It makes them appear bitter or unable to handle conflict.

Professional Alternative: Keep the conversation positive and focus on the experience gained. "While my previous role had challenges, I learned a lot from managing difficult situations and improving my communication skills."

6. Overly Casual Attitude Toward Timeliness (10% Impact)

Scenario: The candidate arrives late for the interview, thinking it's no big deal, especially if they offer an excuse.

Example: "I had a few things to wrap up at home, but I'm here now!"

Why It's Unprofessional: Being late is often seen as disrespectful and unprofessional, as it wastes the interviewer's time and shows a lack of punctuality.

Professional Alternative: Arrive on time (ideally 10-15 minutes early). If late, provide a brief, respectful apology and give an explanation. "I sincerely apologize for being late; it was an unexpected situation, and I'm grateful for your understanding."

7. Using Overly Familiar or Personal Behavior (5% Impact)

Scenario: The candidate uses overly familiar behavior, such as addressing the interviewer by their first name immediately or offering a handshake or hug without waiting for cues.

Example: "Hey, it's nice to meet you, John! Can I give you a hug?"

Why It's Unprofessional: Overstepping boundaries and behaving too familiarly can make interviewers uncomfortable. It shows a lack of understanding of professional boundaries.

Professional Alternative: Address the interviewer by their title or last name unless invited to do otherwise. A firm handshake (if culturally appropriate) or a respectful greeting will set the right tone.

Conclusion

These behaviors might seem harmless or normal to candidates, but they can leave a negative impression on interviewers and harm their chances. By being mindful of these subtle actions and adjusting accordingly, candidates can ensure they present themselves professionally and increase their chances of success in interviews.
